

Contract Management Made Simple.

Challenge

Organizations often subject themselves to wasteful spending that results from ineffective or inadequate management processes related to asset life-cycle management. Corporate IT organizations are responsible not only for the implementation of new technologies that provide their companies a competitive edge, but must also account for the aging technologies that provided that same edge in years past.

IT organizations must account for the decommission and disposal of aged assets that become dated or too inefficient to meet growing demands. A process which must include the management of both the physical and non-physical elements that represent the assets total cost of ownership. Failure to account for the termination of ongoing licensing, maintenance, and subscription services often leave organizations exposed to wasteful spending within their shrinking IT budgets.
